One of the men of the steamer Advance, which arrived from Colon last Thursday, died in the quarantine hospital at Swinburne Island yesterday from yellow fever.

With his death came the announcement that there had been a previous death from yellow fever at the same place in June, the victim also being a man who had returned from Colon. The man who died yesterday, while taken from the Advance on Thursday, showed no yellow fever symptoms until Saturday.

The situation in New-Orleans remained unchanged. Prayers were offered in all the churches for the recovery of Archbishop Chapelle.

With the death yesterday morning of William B. Smith, pantryman of the steamer Advance from Colon, yellow fever claimed its second victim this year within the limits of this city.

The record to date, out of more than two hundred suspected, shows only three genuine yellow fever cases, two of which were fatal. The third was a mild case, the patient recovering.

Doty had grave suspicions of the cause of Smith's disease and studied his case closely. The line between malarial and yellow fever is so thin that even experts hesitate.

"Early Saturday morning," Dr. Doty said yesterday, "I knew Smith had the disease. Until late Friday night the symptoms were those of malaria, and he had been treated accordingly. The change came between midnight and 9 o'clock Saturday morning. We had little hope of saving Smith then, his temperature be-

Smith died with a quiet, hopeful smile on his lips. He was the most cheerful patient on the island, and his cheeriness roused others who had less reason to be worried. Before being taken off the Advance he laughed heartily, and

Smith's was not the first death on the island from yellow fever this year, although the fact is not generally known. Frank O'Leary, a New-

Yorker, died on the island in the middle of June from the disease. Mr. O'Leary was secretary to one of the Supreme Court justices. He went to Colon during the winter to look into mining interests there. On his return he was taken off at Guaymas with symptoms of the

"There has been one more case of yellow fever at Quarantine," said Dr. Doty, "but it was of mild form. We caught it in time to prevent development and the patient recovered."

The patient in that case was one of the crew of a vessel from New-Orleans.
